The Cirlot agency public service campaign, designed to tackle stereotypes, scores a big win for the state of Mississippi.

The public service announcements are edgy; some are even comical. Better yet, political correctness takes a backseat to raw honesty.

And that's why Jackson-based marketing, public relations and corporate communications firm, The Cirlot Agency, believes that its "Mississippi, Believe It!" public service campaign serves its purpose. It creatively confronts all those longstanding stereotypes that have plagued the state for many years through movies and being the butt of jokes.

The posters feature headlines such as, "Yes, we wear shoes. A few of us even wear cleats," which touts the many legendary football players from the state, and "Meet a Few of Our New Good Ole Boys," which highlights the many African-American elected officials in the state, more than any other state in the country, as well as women and Native Americans in high positions.

Not unlike many other interesting ideas, the campaign was born about six years ago when Rick Looser, president and chief operating officer of The Cirlot Agency, had a chance conversation when he was seated next to a young boy from Connecticut on an airplane.

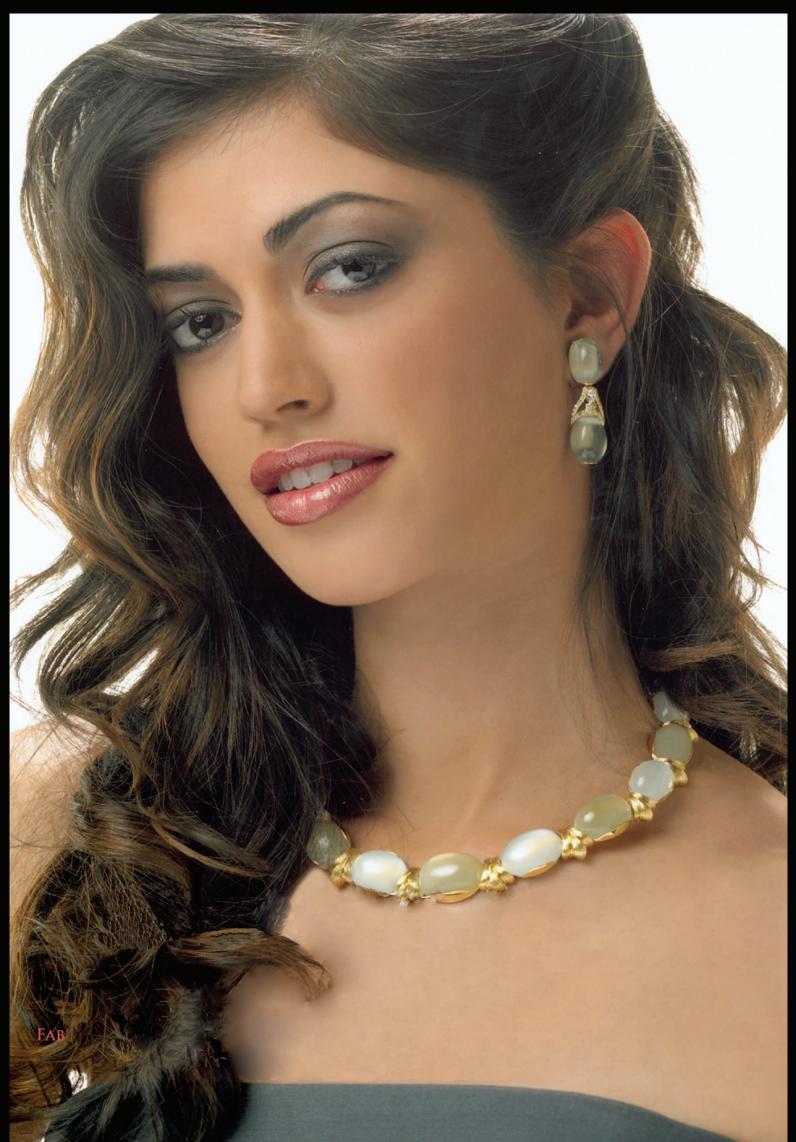

When the boy heard that Looser was from Mississippi, he immediately asked if he saw the Ku Klux Klan in his neighborhood and if he hated all black people. Coming not long after a similar discussion at a business writers' meeting about the state's image, the questions were both a slap in the face and a call to action.

Looser returned to work and immediately gained support from the agency's staff to tackle the issue the best way they knew how – through the creative process.

"The state has so much to offer here, but nobody knows about it," explains Looser, "so with the agency celebrating its 20th anniversary that year, we saw the campaign as our gift to the state, a thank-you for being a part of a place where you can do good business and raise a family."

After tossing around many ideas, Looser and his staff decided that the best approach would be to be both candid and informative: "We really thought that we had to address the 800-pound gorilla that was sitting in the room and that was all the stereo-
